Asia-Building, Future-Embracing- Our Problems, We solve together

The future of Asia holds great potential, and the world is paying attention to the development of Asia. Over the past 30 years, Asia has achieved remarkable development, with consumption levels rising rapidly and successful integration into global trade, capital, talent and innovation flows. In the coming decades, Asian economies will not only participate in these areas, but also determine the direction of these flows. From the Internet, technology to international trade, Asia has long become mainstream in many fields. The key issue today is no longer how fast Asia is rising, but what leadership role it will generate. Although Asian countries contain diverse languages, races and religions, and governments and economic systems are not the same, they share similar development histories and backgrounds.

From 2000, Asia's GDP accounted for less than 1/3 of the world's total, and it is expected to exceed 50% by 2040. By then, Asia is expected to account for 40% of total world consumption. Asia has not only achieved economic progress, but also achieved longevity of residents, increased literacy rates, and rapid spread of technology and the Internet in terms of human development. However, the ensuing issues of resources over-used and health insurance have become serious.

The rise of Asia has not only lifted hundreds of millions of people out of extreme poverty, but has also widened the gap between rich and poor. Urbanization is driving economic development and improving education and public health services. But poverty and other development challenges remain. With the rapid population growth, many cities are unable to provide adequate housing, infrastructure and other related services. Asian countries and regions need to achieve more inclusive and sustainable economic growth in order to cope with the pressures of inequality and environmental issues. In addition to environmental and economic sustainability, Asian countries should also work together for Asia's future toward peace.
